Sir Kariamanikkam Srinivasa Krishnan
Director, National Physical Laboratory of India
New Delhi, India

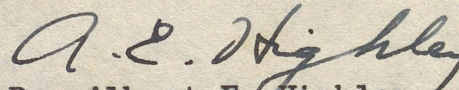

Sir:

It is hard to realize that it has been nineteen weeks since I had the honor to meet you and talk about computers. That occasion has remained one of the highlights of my visit to your country.

You mentioned during our talk the possibility of coming to the United States later this year. If you still plan to come, I look forward to an opportunity to pay my respects to you.

Meanwhile, I have taken the liberty of talking about you to some high officials in the computer business, and I am confident that discussions with their experts and visits to their research laboratories and plants would be easily arranged.

Respectfully yours,

Dr. Albert E. Highley

We lost Dr Krishnan on 14th of June. He died suddenly of an heart attack. His death has been a great loss to Indian science and the country.

Dr Krishnan and I were very old colleagues. And for the past few years have been working together in the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research.

I have, for the time being, in addition to my duties as Director-General of the Council, taken over Dr Krishnan's duties at the National Physical Laboratory. I have seen your letter of June 9 to Dr Krishnan. In acknowledging it, it is my painful duty to convey to you this very sad news.
